

However, with respect to 29 CFR 1910.106(b)(2)(v)(i), OSHA estimated previously that there were 3 million employers that could have aboveground storage tanks that would require venting devices. Of those, OSHA estimated that one-half or 1.5 million employers would turn to the manufacturer for venting device testing. OSHA previously assumed that these 1.5 million employers would have to obtain and make available to OSHA a manufacturer's certificate of test validity. OSHA estimated that it would take each employer 5 minutes to retrieve and provide the manufacturer's test certificate to OSHA and that each employer could have 5 tanks. Based upon these assumptions, OSHA estimated previously that it would take employers 625,000 hours to provide the test certificates (1.5 million employers x 5 minutes/employer x 5 tanks/employer). OSHA used a wage rate of $25.00/hour for the individual who would obtain and provide the test validity certificate. OSHA, therefore, estimated a one-time cost burden of $15,625,000.00.

With respect to 29 CFR 1926.152(i)(2)(v)(I), OSHA estimated previously that there were 1,000 construction sites that could have as many as two tanks per site that would use the manufacturer's test. Using the same wage rate as used for part 1910, OSHA estimated that employers in the construction industry would use approximately 833 hours and spend approximately $20,825.00 to obtain and provide the manufacturer's certificate of test validity.

The total burden estimate for this standard in both general industry and construction was estimated to be 625,833 hours and $15,627,075.00.

With the withdrawal of the previous information collection approval, the burden for these certifications will become zero dollars.
